

Project Veritas Exposes More Left-wing Indoctrination in Education at Prestigious NYC Private School

Project Veritas, the watchdog organization specializing in undercover videos exposing nefarious actors in politics and culture, dropped the second video this week exposing left-wing indoctrination in education. On Thursday, the prestigious Trinity School NYC and its director of student activities, Jennifer Norris, were targeted as Norris was caught on camera bragging about peddling her left-wing activism to students in the name of “education.”

Previously this week, Project Veritas highlighted discriminatory hiring practices in the Greenwich, Connecticut, school district, when they featured administrator Jeremy Boland admitting on camera that, among other things, he would not hire Catholics at the school.

In Thursday’s video, Norris bragged about using her position of authority at the Trinity School to advance her left-wing ideologies.

“I just keep trying to disrupt wherever I can,” the administrator said. “And now that I’m in this position, I have so many opportunities to do that.”

“I don’t hide how I feel, but I can’t pretend I’m [not] promoting an agenda even though I clearly am with all the stuff I’m doing,” Norris was caught saying.

Like much of New York City, Norris confirmed that Trinity School is not a place where conservatives are welcome.

“I mean, we [the school] are not as left as I am, for sure. But it’s definitely a school where conservatives would not feel comfortable.”

Norris also bragged that, in her capacity in booking speakers for the school, conservatives were persona non grata.

“Two days a week, I bring in speakers from outside. So, that’s been a huge opportunity for me to just bring things — any social justice issues or just people with experiences,” Norris said.

Asked specifically if she would ever consider a Republican speaker, Norris replied simply, “I won’t.”

“I’m in charge as far as they [the administration] are concerned. So, if they want to do that [bring Republican speakers], then somebody else has to do it. Because — not on my watch, I guess,” Norris explained.

Norris openly admitted to having a racist and sexist point-of-view regarding some of her students.

“Unfortunately, it’s the white boys who feel very entitled to express their opposite opinions and just push back,” Norris explained. “There’s a huge contingent of them that are just horrible. And you’re like, ‘Are you always going to be horrible, or are you just going to be horrible right now?’ Don’t know.”

Is Norris really saying that the students she describes should not be “entitled” to voice their opinions?

The administrator especially disdained white students with wealthy parents, calling them “awful people.” Those students who come from money likely make up a large portion of the student body, as tuition for the school costs more than $58,000 per student. The school houses grades K-12.

“I don’t know. I think they need to go. I think they’re really awful people. That’s kind of what I’m afraid of with my white students that are rich. I’m like — do you ever have to deal with this? They’re so protected by capitalism. It makes me sad,” Norris said.

Norris had some draconian ideas for removing such students from the school.

“We need to find some, like, Dexter, sort of like a vigilante, taking people out,” Norris joked. Dexter was a television series about a serial killer.

“We just need some vigilante, Dexters. Like, ‘Here’s your community of targets,’ Norris said.

According to Norris, even detention at the school is used as an opportunity to spread the gospel of social justice.

“I give them [students] all the art supplies. They can make posters together. We have people that go to every march,” Norris explained. “So, it’s like the punishment of detention, but it’s not punishment at all.”

When the Project Veritas undercover journalist brought up the idea of having a drag queen story hour for the school children, Norris was enthusiastic.

“Sure!” Norris said. “I think it would be awesome.”

Trinity School doesn’t appear to want to talk about or hear comments about the Project Veritas expose. As of this writing, the school’s Twitter page has been deleted and its Facebook account reports that “content isn’t available right now.”

Of course, this new Project Veritas series highlighting left-wing corruption in education isn’t telling readers of The New American anything new — it’s just more fuel for the fire. Parents are, often unwittingly, sending their most precious possessions — their children — into school systems that have no regard for faith, traditional values, or American ideals. And the more such indoctrination can be exposed, the better.
