Global research into solar geoengineering, or solar radiation modification (SRM), is gaining momentum. Late in June, the White House released a report calling for more exploration of such technologies, while the European Union called for a collaborative risk assessment of the SRM.

In this interview with The New American, investigative journalist Efrat Fenigson discusses the U.N. report “One Atmosphere: An Independent Expert Review on Research and Deployment of Solar Radiation Modification,” published in February 2023. The report examines such methods of the SRM as stratospheric aerosol injections (SAI), whitening of the marine clouds, covering deserts with reflective materials, cultivating GMO plants that would reflect sun rays, and deploying mirrors in space. SAI, the most researched of the methods, is already being tested globally, despite the severity of the risks it poses to human health and broader ecosystems. That includes altering precipitation patterns, reducing crop yields, causing acid rains that would contaminate water and soil, and depleting the ozone layer. All of the consequences would be utilized to establish more control over the desperate populace while also filling the coffers of the corporate members of the World Economic Forum (WEF) as well as figures such as Bill Gates.

The journalist warned against accepting the fraudulent narrative of climate change, asserting that its aim is to exert control over people by employing mechanisms like Central Bank Digital Currencies (CBDC) linked to resource rationing.
