Embalmers the world over are reporting unusual white fibrous clots in their subjects – a growing problem over the past four years. Yet no public or private investigators are taking note – except one. Retired Air Force Major Tom Haviland has spent the last two years surveying embalmers as well as doctors and patients. His results are shocking, especially because time does not seem to be curing the problem. Haviland met with The New American senior editor Rebecca Terrell to update her on the data he has and continues to collect.

View more information about this important developing investigation at the SubStack that Haviland and his co-investigator, Laura Kasner, have put together: Clotastrophe.

Haviland and Kasner are conducting an ongoing “People’s Survey” to hear from individuals about their own experiences. You can participate here:
